Each year, millions enter the Chinese workforce. Although entrepreneurship has become a viable career option, most aren't willing to take that route, and end up at large corporations. At the same time, these millennials want a sense of fulfillment and to make a difference. Can corporates step up to give them a platform to voice their ideas, the tools and skills to develop them and resources to bring those ideas to life? How to create a startup-like culture within large organizations to deliver cool new innovations? Tonight's speaker will lay out a framework just to do that, including the challenges and the uniqueness of doing this in China, and will share some of the amazing results delivered through "intrapreneurship."

Kapil Kane is Director of Innovation at Intel China and runs Ideas2Reality, a China-wide corporate incubator and accelerator of internal ideas. He has a proven track record as an innovator, designer, and leader of teams helping bring blockbuster products into the market. Before joining Intel 6 years ago, Kapil worked at Apple leading design and development efforts on a variety of products ranging from tiny iPod Shuffle to iPad and from MacBook air all the way to the mighty iMac. His contribution to design also spans areas of astrophysics, particle accelerators, and automobiles. He holds an MS from Stanford University and BS from the National Institute of Technology in India, both in Mechanical Engineering and Design. He has spent a decade each living and working in the US and China and has been based out of Shanghai for 10 years.
