Work is going to look significantly different in 20 years. Technology and innovation are of course key to securing an organization's future, but what about the "people" factor? What happens when your workforce is forced to adapt to new things and new ways of working if the people refuse to change? What happens when leaders have a fixed mindset on how to take a company forward? What happens when traditional L&D can no longer "teach" the skills required to do a job well because that job is now done by a robot? Building a learning culture is no longer a "nice-to-have" objective for your HR department; it should be the cornerstone of every organization's vision and growth plans. A learning culture cannot be built overnight; it takes a lot of work, and a lot of time, and needs to start now. This talk will discuss why it's so important to rethink your organization's learning strategy. The success of every organization is determined by the capability of its people, and therefore the investment in people should be #1 on every business agenda.
